The Importance of a CoC

Now is the perfect time to ensure your electrical systems are safe and up to scratch. But there are some people who have never hired an electrician before and there may be some questions. Like how do you know you are getting what you paid for? What proof do you receive that the work has been fully completed and that there have been no shortcuts? Everyone knows the horror stories involving shady or incomplete work from someone.

The Certificate of Compliance (COC) is a declaration by the registered person that the electrical installation has been carried out in accordance with the requirements of the Occupational Health and Safety Act, 1993 and the regulations hereunder. Besides the fact that the COC is proof that the electrical installation is safe, the law requires a property owner to be in possession of an Electrical COC, as do insurance companies. If a property incurs damages a result of an electrical fault, the insurance company will require the owner to provide them with a valid electrical certificate. Failure to produce the document could result in the insurance company rejecting the claim.

If any part of an electrical installation does not comply, the registered person cannot issue a COC.

If you have any questions about an Electrical Certificate of Compliance, contact our friendly team for more information, or request an on site appointment.
